The family also has a phone that can work as both a phone and a smart TV, which is useful in the event that the smartphone or tablet were to break. And don't worry about the monthly bill, as the devices run on Sprint's Network Vision, which gives the same data speeds as Verizon and T-Mobile's networks (and often better, depending on which locations you're in). Call Quality Call quality is average. We saw minimal call drop, but only during calls that were in the middle of heavy congestion. When calls are less congested, the call quality was good. The most annoying thing about this phone is the fact that it's not one that you can just put into your pocket to make phone calls. You have to hold it to your ear or set it on a table for calls, which may become a pain when you're on the go. During calls, we didn't notice a lot of background noise, but did notice an occasional crackling of the speaker, but this was barely noticeable. Data speeds are average Data speeds are not very good. Since this device is a hotspot, you can use the 4G LTE at full speed (up to 150Mbps). This is great if you need a data connection while you're out and about. However, once you're at home and connected to Wi-Fi, you're probably using 1GB or less of data per day. That's nothing to scoff at, but remember you don't need to use this device as a hotspot all the time — you can use your other hotspot devices as well. The best use of the device is on the go. With the right app, you can use it as a hotspot and stream movies and listen to music, so you're not using up data. Battery Life
