It's an antiquated way of doing business that has evolved from its original form to something that's very different from how we really sell products and services today. Plus, it's wildly inefficient. For one, we do not have any of the actual technology that's needed to make that model work. We have little automation and no smart customer analytics. We have minimal merchandising or ordering systems, and no mobile apps. We have no real customer loyalty programs. We have a lot of manual processes and very little technology. Why do I think this model is doomed? Because that's not the model of the future. That's not where customers want to shop. It's not where the customer is. Tinder has added a paid option to its free service. The minimum payment will cost you $1 a month, but you can sign up to get charged just $1 a month. This is 2d92ce491b
