On Unix, is there a way to get the actual amount of disk space used, given that a hard-drive is formatted using a block size, not the sector size? For example, I can get the amount of disk space used if my file system is using a block size of 1024 bytes, but if I have two files, one taking 100% of the disk space, and the other only taking the last 1% of the disk space (thus 512 bytes), I don't get the actual number of bytes used by each file (it seems to just sum the numbers). A: On Unix, use du command. There's a single argument -h that will print a human-readable amount. Here's a sample output: ~$ du -h. 197K ./ If it's the problem with your file-system - you can use du -sh. to show the amount of used and free space in a human-readable format. A: If you're talking about the size of the raw unformatted disk, you can use the df command, which will show
