Many search engines face the problem that their availability is limited at times of the day. Users have to wait longer to access the information they want and need. In a long-term cooperation with the German Bundessicherheitsdienst [Federal Office of the Protection of the Constitution, hereinafter BfV] a web-assisted search was established at the BfV. The Yield-Based-Automated-Web-Assisted-Search system allows a user-friendly input of a partial keyword to be matched against the full-text search of the BfV. Keywords are matched to the technical language of the BfV and then to its legal language. The system then retrieves the respective results, which are further processed by the user. It is a kind of service filter for retrieving a large number of government-related records by means of a limited set of queries. The BfV currently uses its system for internal searching, but an additional goal is to give users more free time.If you haven't seen these images yet, you will when you get the new Twilight movie, but in the meantime, enjoy this collection of pictures of people who suck on lollipops. It's from a magazine called Pop in the UK. It's a strange publication. Like any self-respecting Brit, they love Beatles songs and they look like they went through a time warp in 1974 (that's when this magazine was started). I don't know how they got into taking pictures of people who suck lollip 82138339de
